How to live in the moment?

I remember that all of my childhood, i always used to feel that i don't live in the moment and i am in an imaginary world that moves faster than i comprehend. But indeed, it wasn't a dream and it's real life. I think was something i only feel and no one else.

But as i grew older, i realized that "This feeling of being in a fast-moving, imaginary world was my mind's way of processing life. This imaginary world wasn't an escape, but a space for creativity and understanding. It taught me to value the present moment and cherish my unique perspective.

Now, I see it as a special part of my journey, reminding me that our inner worlds are as real and important as the outer one.

Out, in the east

Have you ever seen a whole 1-hour long sunrise at the beach? The moment, when sun is appearing from the depths of the vast ocean uprising slowly and slowly with brighter and brighter light every moment? The time when the sky changing to many different shades of orange, red, yellow every passing minute? Partially cloudy skies with birds flying across just like an artist's painting? The sound of waves hitting themselves and rocks and the relaxing breeze kissing your face?

Thought many people might haven't experienced this, I believe that these are the small moments that we as humans thrive for!
